

LOCAL FOOD ENVIRONMENTS MATTER FOR HEALTH

The way local food is grown, processed, distributed, and consumed contributes to community health. Making it easier to get fresh local food from farm to table improves the health of individuals, builds the local economy, protects the environment, and promotes the sustainability of local food producers.

My business would love to work with more fruit and vegetable farmers.

Judy, Facebook

I would like to see a network of a variety of community type gardens, local farms and market garden enterprises be supported to make their products more easily available to local residents.

Katie, Quinte West

Local economies stand to improve if local food production is supported.

Amanda, Bancroft

I particularly like the idea of . . . getting local food distributed.

Pam, Prince Edward County

83% of residents support help getting food from local farms to local people.
